The Vermont Democracy and their State Convention.

The Democrats of Vermont had one sea sible year, in 1862, when they ran no State ticket, bothered themselves not a particle about elections, and so saved some time and money. That lucid interval, however, couldn't last. Ever since, as before, they have gone annually through the farce of making their nominations and passing their resolutions; and absurd as it all is, they seem ever to think that they are going to have a chance for success, it not this year, then next. No matter how atter and over whelming is their defeat at each election, " hope still springs responsive " in the democratic breast, and their longing for the " good time coming " changes into belief that it must and will come before long. This has been illustrated, as usual, this year. There was an anusual dramming up of the democracy to the convention. The Boston Past in its editorials and correspondence, summoned . every democrat in the State " to attend " unless unavoidably detained," and kindly laid out before them their work. It told them they were in too much of a hurry about selecting delegates to the next National Convention, and better drop that, till a convention was called. For the rest, they must " marshall and dvill the democratic and conservative forces of the State" ; and for platform, the finances and retrenchment of public expenses was their " hest holt," and must be made much of. The Post's correspondent at Montpelier announced the following discovery :
